Acrobats on the Party Line

J<sub>N</sub> the UN recently, Polish Ambassador Jerzy Michalowski put forward a motion that 14 countries be simultaneously admitted to UN membership. This is a hoary chestnut that the Soviet submits either directly or through one of her satellites several times a year.

This time India, Egypt, and the Philippines promised to vote for Michalowski's motion if he dropped the word "simultaneously." Michalowski agreed, and in the Political committee the entire Soviet bloc, including Russian representative V. A. Zorin, voted for this version.

Next day in the UN plenary session, Michalowski put forward his amended version in Russian. Andrei Gromyko noticed the missing word. He called Zorin. After a whispered conversation, Zorin announced he would vote against the motion he had accepted the previous day.

Michalowski jumped to his feet, his face as white as a sheet. Poland was not voting the same as Russia—rank heresy. Without waiting for the chairman to give him the nod, he shouted at the top of his voice: "I too vote against it." He very handily defeated his own motion.

Destination Unknown

When I left the Ossining train station, I was deeply stirred by the prospect of visiting the headquarters of Maryknoll. Outside the station a cab driver told me he was going up to Maryknoll, so I climbed into the rear seat of his taxi and waited. After he collected another passenger, we started off. The swarthy man beside me seemed bewildered by the prospect of his visit, and I asked companionably, "Do you have anyone up there?"

"Yeah, my brother," he said.

"Wonderful!" I exclaimed. "I suppose your family is happy about him." He studied me with brooding eyes.

"It's a stimulating experience," I continued. "I have a friend there. He was away quite a while and he's so happy to get back."

My fellow passenger didn't share my warmth so I lapsed into injured silence. Soon we rolled up to the great gates.

My companion got out and paid the driver, and I climbed out behind him. "Wait," I said, "I'll go in with you." I looked up at the walls in wonder; I hadn't expected anything so imposing.

The cabbie stared at me without reaching for my money. "I thought you said you were going to Maryknoll?"

"Sure. Aren't we here?" I asked.

"Get back in," he replied wearily. "You got a ways to go yet. This is Sing Sing."
